Airth North Churchyard

The New Churchyard

By the end of the 18th century the occupants of Airth Castle had been keen to close the old parish church and graveyard that lay adjacent to their residence for some considerable time. Its closure, it was felt, would allow the public road there to be diverted. It was only in January 1816 that a new site for the church was selected at the north end of Airth and it was noted that the ground was "suitable for a churchyard as it may be dug without hitting rock or water" (National Library of Scotland Ms 10893).

The burial ground was created immediately upon the work of construction of the new parish church beginning in 1817. It took some three years to complete the building which opened in 1820. Graham Stirling of Airth Castle provided some monetary incentives and encouraged the move to the new burial ground by active participation (see family graveyards). The Airth archive contains a list of people to whom lairs were given in the new churchyard at Airth in exchange for those they had in the old churchyard beside the castle. Those marked with an asterisk were known as "strangers," that is to say people then living outside of the parish. The first entry was for 28 November 1817.

In many cases the families transferred the old gravestone to the new burial ground, though it is unlikely that the bodies were moved as was the case with the Graham family itself. There are numerous stones dating to before 1817 in the new churchyard, including:

YEAR	INVENTORY NUMBER	SURNAME
1773	81
1781	101	McCulloch
1793	149	Wall
1794	14	Gilfillan

1800	216	Steel
1805	171	Hardie
1809	241	Sharp
1813	230	Hardie

The earliest stone in the churchyard dates to 1713 and is a small thick ovoid shape in the local sandstone (195), typical of that period. It is not surprising to see that it features an anchor with a set of initials set to either side.

Illus 2: Stone 195.

Some stones may also have been re-used by thinning them and inscribing new letters. This seems to have been the case with some of the long headstones which stretch across adjacent lairs. They appear to have been flat stones brought from the earlier churchyard and stuck upright along their long sides. Similar sized headstones are found at the Broompark Church in Denny, but there they are of a finer sandstone and are later.

One of the new stones in the new churchyard specifically mentions that Elizabeth Coubrough had died in June 1813 and was buried in the old churchyard (No. 119). When her husband died in July 1836 he too was interred there.

The burial ground at the new church was bounded on the north-east by the main road and here a retaining wall was built along the boundary and spoil from terracing the building was dumped against it to increase the depth of soil for burials. To the south-west there was a steep hill slope leading up to the older road and so this limited the available width of the churchyard. The north-west and south-east boundaries of the churchyard were as they are now, with the area to the south being the more extensive. The ground was laid out in regular rows following the contours of the land and lairs were made available throughout from the very beginning. The stones placed against the road bounding the road naturally had their inscriptions facing inward towards the graveyard, but all of the remainder faced the road, or rather the main access route.

The fresh start meant that the lairs were regularly shaped and a plan allowed their new owners to be easily identified. However, as time went on these plots changed hands, often in informal agreements, and after half a century the situation had become confused. As with the old churchyard, the families with rights to bury only leased the ground from the Heritors and did not own it outright and inevitably disputes arose. A good example of this occurred in 1902 when Mrs Heugh, the widow of James Heugh, Airth, brought a case against the Heritors of the parish. Eight lairs had originally been allotted to the Bauld and Cuthrie families and were acquired by James Heugh (No 151). As a courtesy Heugh allowed Alex Scott, farmer at North Greens, to bury one of his children in the plots. However, Scott then gave permission for Marshall to bury one of his children there. Mrs Heugh asked for the burial to be removed and for the Heritors to reinforce her exclusive right of sepulchre. They refused to do so and the court found that Mrs Heugh could not prove her claim.

Although the churchyard was only opened in the second decade of the 19th century it was already full by the end of that century. Its overcrowded condition was drawn to the attention of the Heritors and the local authorities as early as 1892 by the minister, Rev Leckie, though the chance of the Heritors doing much about it was unlikely as they knew that responsibility was soon to be transferred to the Eastern District Committee of the County Council. Leckie pointed out that at the beginning of that year two bodies had been interred only two feet below the surface of the ground, and that on representations by him the bodies had been taken out and the graves made deeper. This had not been the first instance of such shallow burials and Leckie stated that complaints had been made of "effluvia in the summer time arising from the churchyard" (Falkirk Herald 14 May 1892, 4).

By then there was no slack in the system and in common with other parishes in Scotland the Heritors resorted to legal means to recover unused lairs. In October 1905 advertisements in newspapers brought to light that there were 43 claims for rights to lairs by people living outside of the parish and these were rejected. At the same time Alexander Black CE Falkirk was asked to examine the ground to the south-west for a proposed extension to the graveyard but he noted that the clayey nature, to the depth of five feet, made it unsuitable. In May the following year the Airth heritors requested the Parish Council to close the churchyard at Airth and to provide a new cemetery.

In April 1926 the Parochial Council was still recommending the closure of the churchyard under the Burial Ground (Scotland) Act, but it was not until February 1948 that an official application was made. By then it had been decided to make the previously rejected extension up the hill to the south-west which, being secular, is a cemetery rather than a churchyard.

Illus 4: Ordnance Survey Map of 1959 showing the new Cemetery Extension to the south.

At some point, presumably when the graveyard was extended, some of the gravestones from the churchyard were used in the retaining wall on the south side of the road leading up the hill from the mercat cross to the main entrance to the cemetery. Most are fragmentary, but one is complete and reads: "1823/ JH JR."

The People

Airth is a maritime parish and so it is not surprising to see this reflected in the graveyard by the number of people employed in the merchant marine and also by deaths by drowning. Until the mid 18th century ships had been built within 100m of the new church and a large number of vessels were registered at Airth. However, with the increase in the size of ships and the land reclamations from the Forth, trade moved to Grangemouth. The Duncanson family of shipbuilders moved to Dalgrain on the River Carron. Some of the sailors also made the move but many remained and made the short trip to the new port to board their ships. These included a number of captains from notable families.

Sailors from outside of the parish were often buried in the churchyard if they had the misfortune to die in the vicinity. As late as 30 January 1893 John Sorrier drowned in Kincardine Roads and was buried in Airth Churchyard (Dundee Courier 6 March 1893, 4).

Robert Hutton was drowned in the North Sea in 1882 (No. 91) – and as is usual with such voyages the tombstone does not supply the day of the month as it would not have been known at what stage in the journey the vessel sank. Michael Scobbe drowned at Calcutta in the 1840s (283). It was, however, also common for the young children of the area to fall into water courses during their play and several are noted. No. 95 commemorates John Learmonth who drowned at South Alloa in 1899 aged only three years. Even more tragic was the case of the Cowie family which lost three young sons in separate incidents in 1835, 1837 and 1847 (No. 221).

One of the most famous residents of the graveyard is Peter Gardner who created the internationally renowned pottery at Dunmore. He died on Saturday 1 March 1902 and on the following Wednesday his funeral cortege left the pottery for Airth Churchyard at 2.30pm followed by a small entourage.

The parish was dominated by two landowning families living at Airth Castle and Dunmore House. These large estates required a large workforce and were the bedrock of the rural economy. In 1821 Thomas Graham Stirling of Airth Castle erected a headstone in the churchyard in memory of his Berwickshire-born overseer, James Adamson (No.145), who had died in November 1817 and was therefore amongst the first to be buried at the new site. Almost a century later, in January 1915, Alexander Mitchell, overseer at Airth Castle for 46 years, was also buried in Airth Churchyard.

As the lairs were individually acquired by the local residents themselves there was no separation of the burial ground between these two estates as occurred at Bo'ness for the old barony of Kinneil. Residents of Dunmore can be found scattered throughout the graveyard, as in numbers 13, 16, 26, 54, 111, 231, 238, 239 and 266.

Airth North Churchyard

However, it is noticeable that official burials connected with the Dunmore estate occur to the north of the church – the side on which Dunmore occurs. Again an overseer is to be found. Archibald MacNicoll served for many decades and his stone was paid for in 1828 by the Earl of Dunmore (No. 280). John Taylor, gardener at Dunmore Park for 50 years, had his stone erected by the 5th Earl in 1859 (No. 239). The close relationship between the Murray family of Dunmore and its workforce is seen more poignantly in the adjacent stone where John Taylor's youngest daughter is buried (No. 238). This stone was "erected by the Countess of Dunmore with whose children Joan Taylor had lived."

Farmers are well represented in the churchyard and the farms at Dunmore (16), North Greens (151 & 243), Airth Greens (155 & 181), South Greens (260 & 261), Mains of Airth (122 & 184), Halls of Airth (74 & 104), Pocknave (270), Oxcgang (220) and Letham (197 & 216) are all mentioned.

The farming families of the parish produced a number of students of divinity, two of whom died at a relatively youthful age – John Steel died in 1800 aged 24 years (No 216) and William Carlaw in 1818 aged 23. By the time of his death Carlaw was also the schoolmaster at Airth. His successor in that post was James McCulloch who served for 35 years until his death in 1853. His pupils and friends raised an obelisk monument to his honour. This is a reflection of the importance of this office in local communities at that time and similar monuments are found in other graveyards of the Falkirk area. Typically the effusive dedication ends in a Latin phrase meaning "much beloved."

Illus 6: The Obelisk Monument to James McCulloch looking north.

Another wordy tribute can be found on the monument erected by the congregation and friends of Rev John MacGachen in 1843 (No. 1). Like so many of the gravestones it contains a number of spelling errors showing that the schoolmaster's work did not extend to everyone in the parish. The spelling in the inscriptions is amongst the worst in the Falkirk district and continues as such until the end of the 19th century. It is pretty evident that the sculptor was copying from paper and misreading the text with the result that there is occasionally a jumble of letters that do not even provide a phonetic spelling of the intended word, especially noticeable for surnames. On other occasions the sound of the word is used. For example No 220 which says "in mamorey of there" instead of "in memory of their." This is not the only case of this particular mistake. On one stone the word "there" has evidently been removed by making an indent into the stone and replacing it with "their" (stone 96). A similar word replacement was undertaken on Nos 125 and 126 where the stonemason clearly had trouble with the unusual surname "McNellan."

Two of the stones feature mason's tools (149 & 202) laid out in the same way. They have a mell, square and compass, chisel or chisels, lump hammer, level, trowel, gauge and ruler. 149 dates to 1793 and the style of 202 suggests a similar date. They are well executed and it is tempting to suggest that they were cut by the same stonemason for his own family though what the connection was between the Watt and White families is not known.

Stone 132 contains what may have been a family joke when John Hunter gives the names of his mother as Janet Orr or Hunter – the use of "or" even in this context is most unusual.

Illus 8: Stone 65 with an accurate and detailed depiction of SS Carron. The stone has fallen and so the contrast between the polished surface and the lighter grey background is no longer sufficient to show the image in a clear light.

Resurrectionists

In the Stirling Journal of 1 July 1820 the following report was printed:

"Much to the surprise of the residents of the village of Airth, who, from the exposed situation of their church-yard, and its vicinity to the public road, had imagined themselves secure from the visits of the Resurrectionists – an attempt was made on the night of Sunday the 20th ult. or the following morning, to raise the corpse of an old man who had been buried in Airth church-yard on the 13th June, The depredators, while employed at their hallowed task, were scared by the approach of a neighbouring farmer who was coming to the village, accompanied by his dog, to purchase some medicine for a horse that had been taken ill under night. The dog, on passing, ran into the church-yard and commenced barking furiously; and, though repeatedly called off, he would not quit his place. When alarmed by the dog, the Resurrectionists decamped; - and it was not till a day or two afterwards, that some scholars attending the parish school observed nearly one half of the earth had been taken out of the grave and the sods all carefully laid to one side. The circumstance was no sooner known than a number of inhabitants turned out and opened the grave; when they discovered that the lid of the coffin had been broken and the body partly drawn out. It is shrewdly suspected that the Resurrectionists live in Airth; and should they continue their midnight depredations, means are being taken to ensure their detection, when they will have no chance of escaping the punishment they so richly merit."

It was to counter such actions that a mortsafe society was established in Airth. It purchased a number of cast iron outer coffins which could be used to hold the coffin proper in the ground until the corpses had decayed beyond the point to which they were of any use for the dissection table. The mortsafe was then removed for the next customer to use. One of the mortsafes was made of sheet iron without a base and was on display in the churchyard for over a century. It was photographed there in the late 1950s (RCAHMS 1963, plate 51C) but was subsequently acquired by the National Museum of Scotland and is currently on display in the museum in Chambers Street, Edinburgh

Inventory of Stones

The graveyard was surveyed by Mitchell and Mitchell as part of their East Stirlingshire volume in the 1970s, when 195 stones were recorded. Although the stated intention was to record the gravestones dating to before 1850, many later ones were noted on that occasion.

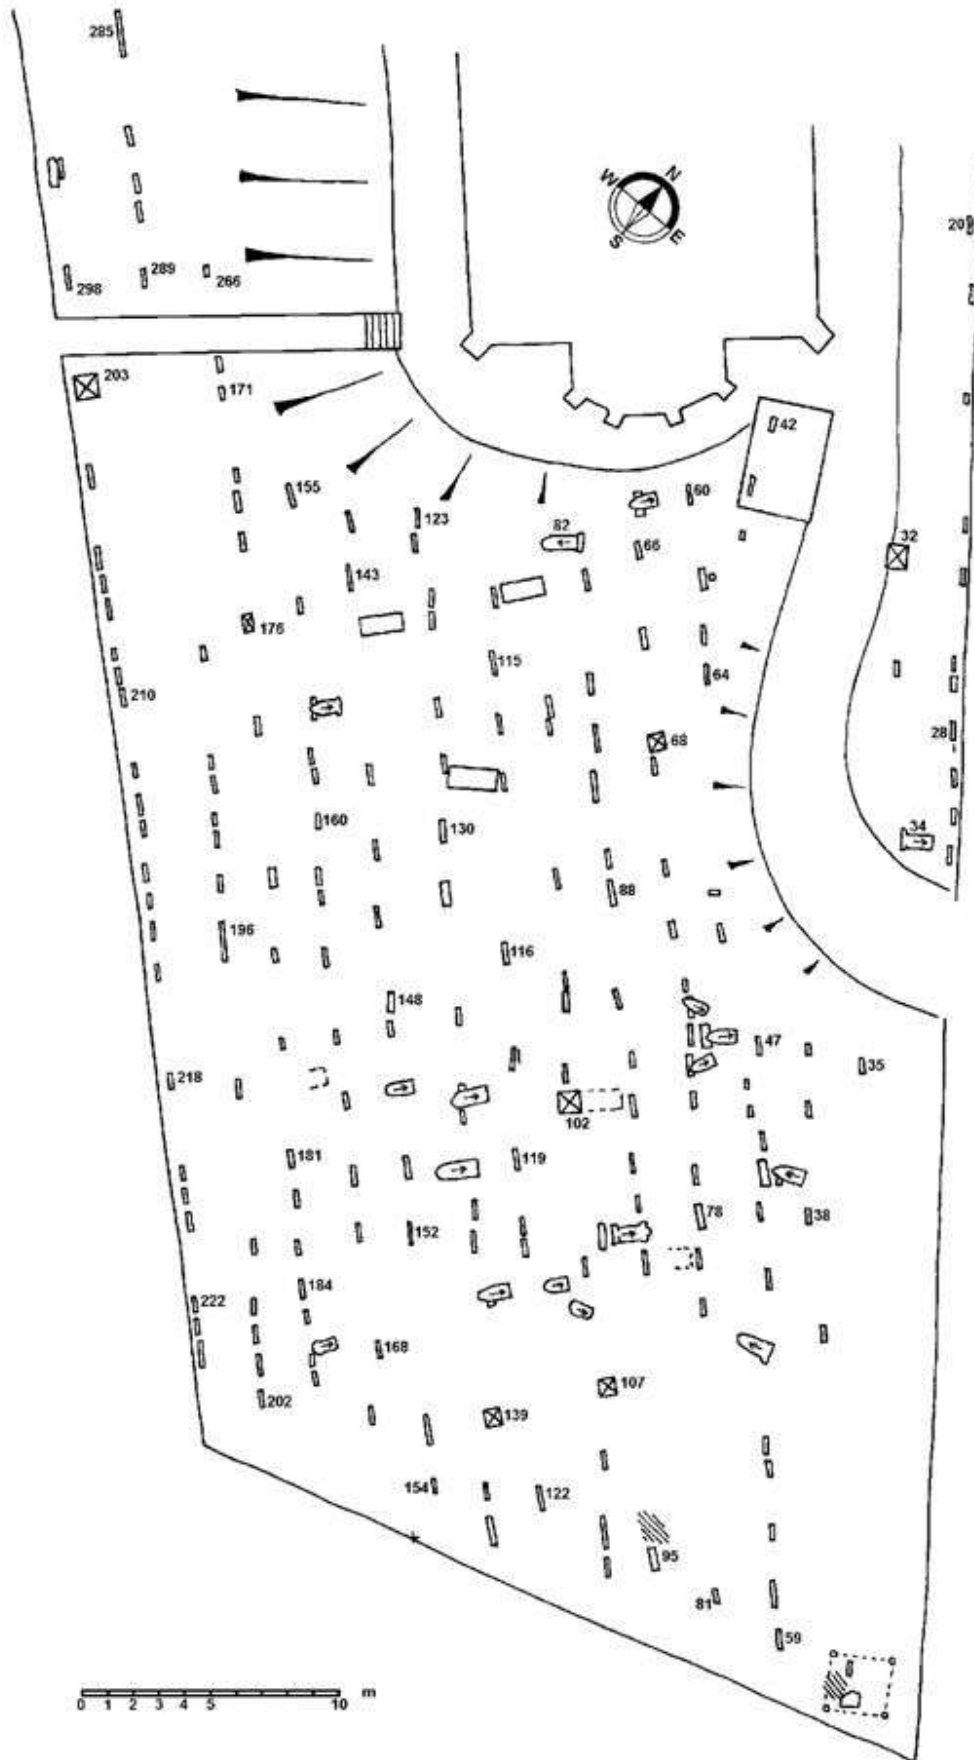

The format of this inventory follows that of previous surveys.

1. Each stone is given a unique number that also appears on the plan:
2. The type of stone, whether flat or head:
3. If a headstone, then the shape of the top of the stone (see volume 10, p.17 for the key):
4. The dimension of the stone starting with the height, then the width and thickness:
5. The inscription:
6. The reference number (in square brackets) used by Mitchell & Mitchell.

Of the 298 stones recorded only 26 were made of imported granite. Granite was commonly used as it represented long life due to its durability. This is a lower proportion than we might expect for a churchyard in use until 1950 and may be accounted for by the relatively long distance from the railway station to the village which would have discouraged transport. There are 8 stones which are of limestone or use it as an inset panel. This white material represented purity and was expensive. In most of the examples it occurs as thin panels or small plaques. As is normal for the Falkirk district the earlier stones are of local sandstone and are often coarse grained. A finer grained bedded sandstone was imported in large numbers, which is unfortunate as it tends to laminate with the result that the entire face sheers off, taking with it the inscription. This emphasises the importance of recording the stones now.

The tops of the gravestones were generally designed to shed water and so triangular-shaped pediments are not unusual. The most common shape, however, was so-called "S-arch" of which there are 73 examples, many of which are hooded. By way of comparison there are 24 stones with pointed arch tops. The sandstone grave markers were evidently carved by local masons and as well as containing the same spelling errors they share many elements of their designs with one another. One of the most common overall layouts was an S-arched pediment supported on shallow square pilasters.
